‘Party of the People’ Showcases Its Diversity at DNC

Despite the lack of significant Indian American visibility during prime-time slots at the Democratic National Convention, President Barack Obama will retain his enormous popularity with Indian American voters, concluded several prominent Democrats who attended the three-day meet Sept. 4-6 in Charlotte, North Carolina.

Several Indian Americans took behind-the-scenes roles during the three-day meet besides Harris — political activist Shefali Razdan Duggal served on the DNC’s Credentials Committee;

“I was walking through every moment cognizant of the fact that we were supporting our nation’s first African American president and all that he has accomplished.” Duggal commented to India-West.

“He has shattered so many barriers, though there are many more to go,” she said, adding that she was also moved by Harris’s presence in the limelight. “Kamala is an inspiration to so many of us,” stated Duggal.

“The RNC was looking back: ‘are you better off than four years ago?’ and we were able to say, ‘yes, we are, and here’s our plan for moving forward,’” added Duggal.
